© DRFounded in 1253, the University of the Sorbonne was at the centre of the Latin Quarter's intellectual activity from the Middle Ages until 1968, when it was occupied by students and stormed by the riot police. The authorities then split the University of Paris into safer outposts, but the Sorbonne still houses the Faculté des Lettres. Rebuilt by Richelieu and reorganised by Napoleon, the present buildings date from the late 1800s, and have a labyrinth of classrooms and lecture theatres, as well as an observatory tower. The elegant dome of the 17th-century chapel dominates place de la Sorbonne; Cardinal Richelieu is buried inside. It's only open to the public for exhibitions or concerts. This Colombian joint turns out Latin American-style hot dogs (with outré toppings like diced pineapple). Our favorite is the zesty Mexican, loaded with salsa verde, melted cheese, crushed potato chips, and squiggles of ketchup and spicy mayo. This simple, no-nonsense cafeteria next to the bus station offers some of the best comida típica (regional specialties) around. It's friendly and very clean. null This lounge in the basement of Zengo specializes in agave-based spirits. A pedestrian and cycling path runs alongside Chemin de la Rivière, which in turn hugs Rivière du Nord and winds through much of town. The well-maintained greenway offers lovely water views, especially around La Maison de Bavière and Les Passionnés, where a picturesque stone bridge crosses a waterfall before linking with a footpath that leads to Chemin de l'Île.
